[Variant of ESTABLISH v.] = ESTABLISH v. in various senses.

From the 16th c there seems to have been a tendency to confine the use of the form stablish to those uses in which the relation of meaning to stable adj. is apparent, i.e. where the notion is rather 'to strengthen or support (something existing)' than 'to found or set up'. The modern currency of the word is purely literary, and reminiscent of the Bible or Prayer Book.

Stadia (stē·diă). [Of obscure history; prob. derived from Stadium, and perhaps from the plural stadia. Cf. F. stadia (Littré Suppl., with quot. of 1876).

It is doubtful in what country the word originated; the statement in the first quot. below lacks confirmation.]

An apparatus for measuring distance by optical means. a. Mil. An instrument consisting of a glass plate, or a brass plate with an opening of the form of an isosceles triangle, marked with figures showing the distance at which a foot- or horse-soldier will be when his image covers a certain height on the instrument held at arm's length. b. Surveying. An apparatus consisting of a rod or staff placed at one end of the distance to be measured and a pair of horizontal lines, hairs or wires on the diaphragm of a telescope placed at the other end. Also attrib. as in stadia hairs, lines, measurement, method, -rod, -surveying, telescope.

By British surveyors stadia is commonly used as equivalent to 'stadia rod'; in the U. S. this use appears to be rare. The 'stadia method' has two varieties: in the one the staff is graduated and the telescope hairs fixed at a known distance apart; in the other the staff is of known length and the hairs are movable.

1865 Mayer in Jrnl. Franklin Inst. Jan. 4 The idea to measure the distances by a scale and the micrometer of a telescope was proposed by an Italian engineer about 45 years ago, and the name of Stadia (scale) was given by him to that kind of measure. Ibid. 3 Construction of a Stadia. Ibid., To..compute the error of the reading on the Stadia scale. 1865 S. W. Robinson Ibid. Feb. 74 The error of the stadia measurement has been found to be about one foot in 800 or 1000. Ibid. 75 A much more convenient arrangement than the rod and targets, is a flat surface of three or four inches width and the required length, painted in such a manner that the distance can be read to a foot by the observer himself. By the French this is called a stadia. 1871 Trans. Amer. Inst. Min. Engin. I. 377 An extra pair of hairs for stadia purposes. 1890 W. F. Stanley Surv. Instrum. 321 For convenience the tangent is more generally taken upon a graduated stadia or staff which is erected for measurement perpendicularly to the horizon. 1899 W. G. Bligh Notes Instrum. Engin. Field-work 122 The telescope fitted with stadia lines on a stop glass. Ibid 124 Stadia hairs are horizontal lines, either hairs fixed to the diaphragm or else marked on a stop glass. 1900 H. M. Wilson Topogr. Surveying xii. 238 The stadia is a device for determining the distance of a point by means of a graduated rod, and the distance subtended on it by auxiliary wires in the telescope of a transit or alidade. Ibid, The term stadia surveying is used to include not only the measurement of the horizontal distance, but also the determination of heights by means of vertical angles observed to a fixed point on the rod.

L. stāre to stand (OF. ester, Prov. estar). From the etymological meaning standing, station, standing place, were developed in OF. many special senses, which passed into ME; the only senses that have survived into mod Fr. are 'story of a building' (= 1 a) and certain fig. applications of this. Mod.F. stage, the 'terms' to be kept before admission to certain professions, is ad. med L. stagium, ad. OF. estage. In OF. estage was taken as the etymological equivalent of L. stadium, and used to render that word as denoting an ancient measure of distance (hence sense 7 below). Branch IV represents an English development of meaning, which seems to have begun about 1600, and for which it is not easy precisely to account. It may in some degree have been influenced by the notion of an etymological connexion of the word with L. stadium; at any rate this notion is distinctly traceable in the medical use 11 b.]

Stager (stēˑdʒəɹ). [f. Stage sb. + -er 1.

It is not wholly impossible that in the expression old stager (sense 1 below) the word may be ad. OF. estagier an inhabitant, resident (f. estage Stage sb.), or med. L. stagiarius (see Stagiary 1) which is used in English monastic records (e. g. Cust. St. Augustine's, Canterbury, Henry Bradshaw Soc. Publ. XXIII) for an aged monk who was lodged permanently in the infirmary. Derivation from Stage sb. is, however, more probable, but the precise notion seems difficult to determine. The usual explanation that the theatrical stage is alluded to ('one who has been long on the stage of life') finds no support in the 16th and 17th c. examples; the primary sense may be that indicated in the definition of sense 2, but this is supported only by a single quotation.]

†Stainand, a. Her. Obs. Also 6 staynand, 7 staynant, 7, 9 stainant. [app. a pres. pple. of STAIN v. (either northern ME. or repr. OF. desteignant).] An epithet of certain colours.

The precise sense and correct application are very doubtful, most of the successive writers having apparently copied from their predecessors with little understanding. The Book of St. Albans (quot. 1486 s.v. STAINING ppl. a.) seems to use 'steining colowre' for any tincture (whether 'colour' or 'metal') which presents a uniform tint in contradistinction to spots, etc.; according to this authority the 'steining' colours are the only ones that may appear on the shield of a gentleman. On the other hand, according to Legh (1562), 'staynande' colours are those which may not be used in armory; tawny or tenné, being the 'surest' of all the mixed colours, is the only one of them that is not 'staynande'; we may perhaps hence infer that Legh took the adj. to mean 'fugitive' (cf. STAIN v. 2), or rather 'indeterminate'. Guillim (1610) says that some heralds disallow the use of tawny and murrey (or sanguine) for fields, regarding them as 'staynande' (Ferne in 1586 speaks of these two as 'stains', not colours), but it is not clear how he interpreted the adj. The later notion that staynand means 'disgraceful', designating tinctures that are used for the purpose of 'abatement', appears to be entirely unfounded.

1562 LEIGH Armory 19 Tawney,..blared by thys woorde, Tenne. It is a worshipfull colour...But very fewe Englishe men beare the same. Yet it is armorye, and so are all coloures, that are not staynandes. Ibid. 19 b, Tenne..is the surest colour..beeyng componed. For it is made of two bryghte coloures, whiche is Redde, and Yellowe. And ye shall not haue any colour so made emongest all y^t may be deuysed, and not to be staynande. 1610 GUILLIM Heraldry I. iii. 11 [Copies Legh and continues thus:—] The last of the seuen mixed colours, we doe commonly call Murrey, but in Blazon, Sanguine, and is (as most truly saith Leigh) a Princely Colour, being indeed one of the colors appertaining of ancient time to the Prince of Wales...Some Heralds of approued iudgement doe hardly admit these two last mentioned for Colours of Fields, in regard they are reckoned Staynand Colours. 1688 PHILLIPS, Stainand-colours, in Heraldry are tawney and murrey. 1673 A. 1. An ascending series or 'flight' of steps leading from one level to another, esp. from one floor to another in a house; a staircase.

Still the ordinary use in Scotland, where 'up the stair', 'down the stair' are the usual equivalents for upstairs, downstairs, and '(to go up) six stairs' means what in England would be expressed by 'six flights of stairs'. (The whole series of steps between two successive floors counts, however, as a single 'stair', even when it consists of two or more 'flights' or portions separated by a landing.) In England the sing. in this sense is now very rare, exc. in phr. on the stair, which is itself slightly archaic.

Stake (stēk), sb.[2] [Of uncertain etymology.

Perh. f. STAKE v.[1] On the alternative supposition that the sb. is the source of the vb., the former may be the same word as STAKE sb.[1] The peculiar use might have been developed from the phrase on the stake, which may originally have referred to a custom of placing on a 'stake' or post the object (an article of clothing or the like) hazarded on the event of a game or contest. There is, however, no evidence of the existence of such a custom; and in our quots. the first example of the phrase is dated 1592, while the use of the sb to denote the money risked on a game of dice is more than half a century older.]

Stale (stēl), sb.[3] [Prob. a. AF. estale, estal (only in Bozon, 13th c.), applied to a pigeon used to entice a hawk into the net; that this word is not an adoption from English is rendered probable by the occurrence of the extended form estalon in continental Fr. with the same sense (Cotgrave 1611; Godefroy gives earlier instances spelt estolon, etelon). Of Teut. origin; cf. OE. stælhrán decoy reindeer, stælla (Northumbrian) catching (of fish), prob. from the root of steall place (STALL sb.[1]) stellan to place; for the sense cf. the rendering of stale by 'stacionaria' in the Promptorium, and G. stellvogel decoy-bird.

It has been usual to regard the stæl- in stælhrán as identical with the combining form of stalu theft (as in stælgiest predatory guest, stælhere plundering army); but the difference of meaning renders this unlikely; and the current identification of ONorthumb stælla with stalu seems inadmissible on grounds both of form and sense.]

Stalemate (stēˑlmēt), sb. Chess. [f. Stale sb.[6] + Mate sb.[1]

Strictly a misnomer, as the 'stale' (so called until 18th c.) is not really a mate.]

A position in which the player whose turn it is to move has no allowable move open to him, but has not his king in check.

According to modern rules, the game which ends in stalemate is drawn. In England from the 17th c. to the beginning of the 19th c. the player who received stalemate won the game. Various other rules have been in vogue at different times; sometimes the player giving stalemate won, either wholly or to the extent of half the stake; sometimes the last few moves had to be played over again until a mate resulted; sometimes the piece causing the obstruction was removed.

1765 Lambe Hist. Chess 91 When the King has no man whom he can play, and is not in check, yet is so blocked up, that he cannot move without going into check, this position is called a stale-mate, or Pat, in this case the King who is stale-mated wins the game. 1847 Staunton Chess-Player's Handbk. 33 He places the adverse King in the position..of stalemate.

Chess Mag.* 285 Several mediæval problems involve the condition that the one player forfeits his power of moving when his King is in a stalemate position.

Stalemate (stēˑlmēt), v. Chess. [f. Stalemate sb.] trans. To subject to a stalemate.

1765 Lambe Hist. Chess 91 In this case the King who is stalemated wins the game. 1813 Sarratt Wks. Damiano etc. 235 White cannot take the Rook without stalemating his adversary. 1879 Meredith Egoist xlvii, At the game of Chess it is the dishonour of our adversary when we are stale mated.

The length of the vowel in the first syllable seems to be authenticated by some of the early ME. forms; the shortening of á to a in the first element of a compound is normal. The OE. stǽl (the quantity of which is certain from the three occurrences in poetry) appears not to be immediately connected with the synonymous stæl with short vowel (dat. stale); according to some scholars it represents a contraction of O'Teut. stapi-* or stadi-*, the relation of OE. stǽl to stæðol foundation (see Staddle sb.) being considered parallel with that of mál speech to the synonymous mælel. The 13th c. form stælwurðe, occurring only once (see 3 6) strongly confirms this view.

The early ME. forms with medial e, stele-, steale-, stalewurðe are difficult to account for.]

Rom. verb represented by It. stampare to tread, press, print, Pr., Sp., Pg. estampar to stamp, print, OF. estamper (mod.F. estamper, in some technical senses étamper) to stamp; whence the verbal noun It. stampa press, printing-press, Sp., Pg. estampa, F. estampe engraving, estampe, étampe stamp, die.

The view stated above seems on the whole more likely than the alternative supposition that the verb did not exist in OE., but is solely an adoption of OF. estamper (see above). At the same time there can be little doubt that the sense-development of the Eng. verb has been influenced by the uses of its Fr. cognate.

The Teut. root stamp-* is prob. a nasalized form of stap-* to tread; if so the primary sense of the verb would seem to be that of branch II below, from which the other senses might easily be derived. Some scholars regard the root (pre-Teut. stomb-*) as cogn. w. Gr. στεμβ-ειν † to shake, † to maltreat (occurring only once); radical connexion with STUMP sb. has also been suggested.]

The pa. pple., which this vb. prob. did not possess in OTeut., has been variously supplied in the different langs.: the type staðono-*, which conforms to the general rule of the a, ō conjugation, is represented in ON., Norw., MSw.; the other Teut. langs., so far as they do not take their pa. pple. from the shorter form of the verb (see below) have a formation based on the present stem, as in OE. (ge)standen. In English the regular form of the pa. pple., standen (with the variants stande, etc.) continued until the 16th c., when its place was taken by stood from the pa. t. A few examples of a weak form standed occur in writings of the 16th c.; in compounds (understanded, withstanded) this formation was less rare, and survived into the 17th c.

In all the Teut. langs. exc. English, Gothic, and Old Norse, the present stem has a shorter form, the OTeut. type of which varies between stað-* and stð-* (WGer. stā-); in some of the langs. this is used exclusively, and in others along with the longer form stand-. In some of the languages the earlier form of pa. pple. has been wholly or partially superseded by a new formation from the shorter present stem. The dialectal range of the shorter type will appear from the following list of typical forms (minor variations being omitted): OS. inf. stān (rare; MLG. inf. stān, pa. pple. gestān; mod.LG. inf. staan, pa. pple. staan), OLow Frankish inf. stān (MDu. inf. staen, 3 pres. ind. staet, staet, pa. pple. gestaen; mod.Du. inf. staan, pa. pple. gestaan); OFris. inf. stān, stēn, 3 pres. ind. stet, pa. pple. stān (WFris. inf., 1 pres. ind. stean); OHG. inf. stān, stēn (MHG. inf. stān, stēn, mod.G. stehen, gestan); MSw. inf. stā (mod.Sw. stå, pa. pple. wk. stådd); Da. inf. staa, pa. pple. staaet; Norw. inf. staa, pres. staar, star.

The remarkable parallel between the verbal stems stā-, stai-, stand-* and gē-, gai-, gand-* (see Go, Gang vbs.) strongly suggests that one of the two series has been assimilated to the other. The relation between the two, however, and the precise mode of formation of the shorter verbal stems from the roots, is very uncertain. For an outline of the different views, with references, see Deutsches Wb. ('Grimm') X. II. 1433.]

Rom. estend-ere (L. extend-ĕre to stretch out: see EXTEND v.) + -ARD; a parallel synonymous formation with different suffix is It. stendale, late OF. estandale, -deille (med.L. standale, -ālis). The Fr. word has passed into all the living Teut. langs.: MHG. stanthart (by popular etymology, as if 'stand hard'), later standart, standert (mod G. standarte), MDu. standaert (mod.Du. standaard, standerd), Da. standart, Sw. standar.

The origin of sense 9 ('standard of measure or weight'), whence the other senses in branch II are derived, is somewhat obscure. It appears in AF. (estaundart) and Anglo-L. (standardus) in the 13th c., two centuries earlier than our earliest vernacular instance. It has not been found in continental OF.; the use of Du. standaard in this sense is believed to be imitated from English. It is noteworthy that in early instances the standard of measure is always either expressly or by implication called 'the king's standard', an expression which belongs to the older sense 1. It seems probable that sense 9 is a fig. use of sense 1; the king's standard being the point of reunion of the army, and the centre from which commands are issued.

The senses grouped as branch III are of doubtful, probably of various and in some instances of mixed origin. The notion of 'something conspicuously erected', involved in sense 1, would account for several of them; others may be referred to the idea of 'something permanent, fixed, or stationary', generalized from sense 9. Etymological association with STAND v. has, however, certainly affected the whole group, and it is possible that in some uses the word should be regarded as an alteration of STANDER. The senses of this branch are almost confined to English: OF. has estandart some kind of torch (rare—1), and WFlem. has standaart mill-post (De Bo; standaert, Kilian); but the relation of these to the English uses is obscure.]

I. A military or naval ensign.

1. A flag, sculptured figure, or other conspicuous object, raised on a pole to indicate the rallying-point of an army (or fleet), or of one of its component portions; the distinctive ensign of a king, great noble, or commander, or of a nation or city.

† Standard-general: the principal standard of an army.

In Eng. the word appears first with reference to the 'Battle of the Standard' in 1138. A contemporary writer, Richard of Hexham, relating the story of the battle, describes the 'standard' there used as a mast of a ship, with flags at the top, mounted in the middle of a machine which was brought into the field. He quotes a Latin couplet written on the occasion, which says that the standard was so called from 'stand', because 'it was there that valour took its stand to conquer or die'.

2. In a more restricted sense, a military or naval flag of some particular kind.

Ordinarily, the standard is understood to be distinguished from a banner by being long and tapering instead of square, and from a pennon by its greater breadth. The British royal standard, however, which is flown when the king or a member of the royal family is present, is now a square flag (thus technically a 'banner'), divided into four compartments bearing the emblems of England (twice), Scotland, and Ireland. In the British army, the regimental flags of the cavalry are called standards, those of the infantry being 'colours'. In the U.S. army the flag of a cavalry regiment is called its standard.

The corrupt form stallion (quot. 1601 in 1 a) may have had dialectal currency; cf the converse mispronunciation staniel for stallion, which is common in rustic speech. The spurious forms standgale, -gall, given in some recent dictionaries, are evolved from the etymologizing conjecture 'stand-in-gale' (Swainson, Prov. Names of Birds). The alleged Ger. synonym steingall, commonly cited by etymologists as cognate, is of doubtful genuineness. The 19th c. lexicographers seem to have obtained it, directly or indirectly, from the Vocabula of Peucer and Ebor (1549). But although in this glossary the word is treated as German, its source appears to be William Turner's Avium Historia (Cologne 1544), where steingall is said to be the English word for tinnunculus. Turner's steingall prob. represents steingall*; Gesner (1555) says that it is northern English. The English ornithologists of the 17th c., following Gesner, give steingall as an English name of the bird; Willughby's stone-gall is an etymologizing alteration of this.]

The (M)LG., (M)Du. stapel, and hence the G. and Sw. stapel, Da. stabel, have the sense 'emporium, mart'; in addition to the senses mentioned under the preceding sb. It is, however, uncertain whether this sense was developed in MLG., or whether it originated in OF., and was thence adopted into MLG. The precise relation of this sense to the other senses of the Teut. word is also uncertain. It has been usually held to have been developed from the sense 'heap, pile'. This is not impossible; but, on the other hand, in the Frankish laws regis stapulus meant the place where the king or his representative administered judgement; the original notion may have been that of 'raised platform'. The transition would be easy from the Frankish sense of regis stapulus to that of the 'king's staple' for the collection of duties on merchandise.]

1. A town or place, appointed by royal authority, in which was a body of merchants having the exclusive right of purchase of certain classes of goods destined for export; also, the body of merchants so privileged. Now only Hist.

The English word has not been found earlier than 1423; the AF. estaple and the Anglo-L. stapula, however, occur in statutes and official documents from the reign of Edw. II onwards, and these contain evidence that the institution of the staple was of older date. Each staple had a mayor and constables, appointed by the king, and in early times distinct from the municipal authorities, though latterly the mayor of some boroughs was ex officio mayor of the staple. At various times the chief staple was oversea, usually at Bruges or Calais; from about 1390 to 1558 it was at Calais, which is often called 'The Staple'. There were also staples in many important towns of England, Wales, and Ireland, the list of which varied greatly at different periods. Statute of the Staple: the ordinance 27 Edw. III (1353), which established staples in various English towns, and at Carmarthen, Dublin, Waterford Cork, and Drogheda, and contained regulations for their form of government and the conduct of their business. (For statute of the staple in another application, see STATUTE STAPLE.)

2. (More fully Court of Star-chamber.) A court, chiefly of criminal jurisdiction, developed in the 15th c. from the judicial sittings of the King's Council in the Star Chamber at Westminster. The judges were the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy Seal, and any peers that chose to attend. The rules of procedure of the court rendered it a powerful instrument in the hands of a sovereign or a ministry desirous of using it for purposes of tyranny, and the abuse of it under James I and Charles I have made it a proverbial type of an arbitrary and oppressive tribunal. It was abolished by an Act of the Long Parliament in 1641.
